HEARING

structures" under the park regulations and did not believe that farmworker housing fell within APA jurisdiction. During the construction, the APA initiated enforcement activities claiming the units were "single family dwellings" and subject to APA oversight.

Following a hearing, the farm was fined by the APA, which said the Lewises failed to obtain its permits. The Lewises sued, arguing the structures were exempt. The parties filed briefs with the court and New York Farm Bureau filed an amicus curiae (friend of the court) brief.

At the core of Farm Bureau's brief is the assertion that agriculture is essential to the state economy, and it is the policy of the state to encourage the development of agricultural land for agricultural purposes. The central question in the case is whether permanent on-farm worker housing built in a resource management area is an agricultural use structure, defined in Executive Law Section 802 (8) as "any barn, stable shed, silo, garage, fruit and vegetable stand or other building or structure directly and customarily associated with agricultural use." Whether farmworker housing is encompassed in the definition of "agricultural use structure" is the heart of the issue.

Farm Bureau's brief further argued that the phrase "building or structure directly and customarily associated with agricultural use" requires special attention and analysis, since such language implicates a knowledge and understanding of farm operations and practice. On this matter, Farm Bureau's brief emphasized that the APA had no special competence or expertise, and thus its views were entitled to no deference from the Court.

In November 2008, State Supreme Court Justice Richard B. Meyer agreed with the Lewises. The APA appealed. The parties filed briefs with the Court in this matter, and Farm Bureau again filed an amicus curiae brief.

In its second amicus brief, NYFB contended that the APA refused to acknowledge fundamental truths about farm life or to consider any existing legal authority on the role of worker housing in farm operations.

Further, NYFB asserted the APA ignored state policy on the protected role of farming in New York when it based its positions on a false, implicit premise that unregulated farmworker dwellings in the Adirondack Park could threaten resources.

New York Farm Bureau's Legal Defense

Fund was used to underwrite the cost of both amicus briefs. The Legal Defense Fund was formed to provide financial support and legal advocacy for cases such as this, which involve issues with the potential for far-reaching impacts on farmers throughout New York State. As a fund supported solely by outside contributions, mainly from our farmer members, it provides a means for farmers to stand unified and strong while facing challenges in the legal arena.

On May 26, 2009, John Privitera, the Lewis' attorney, argued before the Appellate Division, Third Department, that farming creates and preserves open space and that farmworker housing is necessary to farming. The APA argued that residential structures are under the APA's jurisdiction.

A decision is expected this summer.
