DAIRY: Hudson Valley cooperative has grown to sell 40,000 pounds of milk per week

foam-type mattresses, kiln-dried sawdust and chips is slightly more than 54,000 for his 60 cows. In July, after an upgrade to his exercise yard, the count dropped to 41,000 and is at about 40,000 now, he said.

"Clean udders make clean milk," Davenport said. "Hudson Valley Fresh enhances our milk price for fluid milk. Our quality standards are way higher."

The cooperative started in 2004, when Simon, who grew up on a dairy farm in Middletown, retired from orthopedic surgery and decided to go back into the dairy business. It broke his heart, he said, to learn that milk prices were as low as they had been in the early 1980s, about $13/cwt. for Class I. Input prices were so high that dairies all around him were failing. There were 275 dairies in Dutchess County in the 1970s and now there are just 26. Hudson Valley Fresh farms are currently preserving 5,000 acres of open land, significantly contributing to agriculture sustainability.

At first, the co-op sold 400 pounds of milk a week in six stores in the Hudson Valley. Now, it sells 40,000 pounds a week in markets that have extended to New York City and Long Island.

"It's growing every month," Simon said about the demand for the milk, which he wants to "brand, like the Napa Valley does for wine."

Hudson Valley Fresh is served at the New York governor's executive mansion, a practice started by former Gov. Eliot Spitzer and continued by David Paterson. New York University, Bard College, Vassar College, Millbrook School, The Dutchess Day School, and the Culinary Institute of America also serve the cooperative's milk.

Two years ago, Hudson Valley Fresh started selling in Whole Food stores in New York City, which Simon said came about because the chain's vice president drove past his farm and saw a Hudson Valley Fresh truck and recalled tasting the milk.

"They came to us," he said, noting that the milk's reputation has grown so much that there are food stores and restaurants, including the upscale Eli's Manhattan, whose owner, Eil Zabar, will not serve milk from any other dairy.

Having the support of the retail owners, Simon said, is key. It is part of Hudson Valley Fresh's whole marketing philosophy; once consumers are convinced to try the milk, they will find it tastes so good that they'll become loyal customers and be willing to pay a little more for it than for conventional milk. That's why member farms regularly participate in tastings in New York City and other places in the region where the milk is marketed.

"You have to get the farmer out to meet

HUDSON VALLEY FRESH DAIRY COOPERATIVE producers strive for the highest quality milk and their customers are willing to pay a premium price for it.

the public," he said. "You have to meet the consumer, face-to-face."

Simon's philosophy, and his willingness to commit his own money to get the cooperative going, has been greatly responsible for the success of Hudson Valley Fresh in a time when many dairy farmers are struggling to stay in business. He also lobbied the industrial development agency in Dutchess County to give the cooperative grant funds for marketing initiatives to build trust and confidence in the milk.

Davenport agrees that the promotional component is important. "The consumer has to be convinced to try it, because if they do, they'll come back for more," he said.
