

Overtime

York, told the wage board they currently receive less pay under the new labor law than they did last year, because of the limits on overtime. They worry that further limits would reduce their income even more, money that they send home to care for their families.

Long Island Farm Bureau executive director Rob Carpenter also raised the issue of food donations. The need for food assistance tripled on Long Island during the pandemic and said it will be even harder to feed New Yorkers in need if more farms go out of business because of high costs.

Maureen Torrey of Torrey farms routinely donates six million pounds of food each year, but that will change with higher labor costs.

"It would be too expensive to harvest and low income families would lose out," said Torrey.

The two democratic chairs of their respective agriculture committees, Sen. Jen Metzger and Assembly Member Donna Lupardo, also spoke out against lowering the overtime threshold.

Lupardo said farming is currently in a perilous state. She says to revisit this issue when farmers get fair price for what they produce, and consumers will be willing to pay it. Metzger echoed those comments saying farmers she has spoken with are facing economic difficulties and that it is especially a struggle for smaller farms.

The wage board, which includes NYFB President David Fisher along with Brenda McDuffie, president and CEO of the Buffalo Urban League and Denis Hughes representing AFL-CIO, must submit a report and recommendation by the end of the year.

Many testified that it is simply too early to make a decision. Farmers are still adjusting to the new labor mandates, trying to figure what works best for their farm and employees. Combined with the future uncertainty connected to the pandemic, 2020 is not the time to make it harder for everyone in agriculture.

"There may still be unknown variables that we can't predict depending on how long all of this lasts. It is simply too soon to know of farms can absorb a lower overtime threshold rate during this extreme financial downturn," said Jeff Williams, NYFB Public Policy Director in his testimony to the wage board.
