

Dean Boor

“Seeing Cornell as a 4H-er and having my eyes open to the disciplines that were on campus, the beautiful buildings, and the emphasis on food and agriculture, from that moment on there was no place else for me,” said Dean Boor.

Boor graduated with a degree in Food Science in 1980. Later she would become that department’s first female tenured faculty member in 1994. She never sought out to become Dean of CALS; in fact she calls herself an accidental administrator. She found herself on the radar of Cornell’s central administration after serving on a university strategic planning committee. When asked to serve, she willingly stepped up to lead.

Her initial time at the helm of CALS came with some major challenges. She took over in 2010 following the major economic downturn of 2008. The school had seen a 27% cut in state funding and she was forced to confront the university’s own loss in revenue in a depressed economy. One of the outcomes of that process was the creation of the School of Integrated Plant Science (SIPS).

SIPS took five plant disciplines and housed them under one umbrella. Boor said it is aimed at all kinds of practical problems that are facing the state’s producers, from disease problems of various plants, grapes and other fruits to the most fundamental questions about higher rates of success when grafting plants.

“It was clear if we could bring these folks together around a single curriculum and to share their vision that they could frankly be more than the sum of their parts. That has been very true. It is now one of the top units in the entire university in terms of bringing in outside research dollars,” she said.

She gives much of the credit to SIPS’ success to the faculty. It has increased CALS visibility on the world stage, attracted top scientists to benefit New York agriculture, and led to growing enrollment at both the undergrad and graduate levels.

“The formation and the subsequent success of the School of Integrative Plant Science may be the single one thing that makes me the happiest and the proudest,” she said.

Her impact is felt far beyond the research that goes on at the school. The focus on student success has also been central to her work. Under her leadership, CALS adopted an active learning model, doing away with the traditional long lectures that students of the past may recall.

“They were simply not retaining the information. They may be rapidly copying it but not remembering it. They aren’t really asking questions about it. What we learned is that particular style works for relatively small groups of students but not for most,” said Dean Boor.

Now young people who grew up in the age of smart phones are eager to learn in different ways. With active learning, they are presented with the information outside of the classroom. Then when they get to class, they put that info to work. She said it has been especially beneficial for students from rural communities who may not have had access to advanced placement courses and accelerated learning programs in high school. Grades have gone up and students are retaining much more information.

“When people really work with knowledge and information, everything improves. The college invested heavily in the ways we teach across the college,” said Boor.

Just as Boor faced trying times at the beginning of her time as Dean, she leaves with challenges as well, namely the COVID-19 pandemic and its impacts on the college and agriculture alike. It has revealed some weaknesses in our food system. For instance, it was difficult for dairy processing plants to pivot when demand dropped from the food service industry and school systems. Boor believes Cornell will play a critical role moving forward in examining all aspects of the food chain, from the business side to the practical applications in the processing and distribution of products that consumers want in order to make the system more robust in the future.

Part of that comes from the implementation of strong public policy grounded in evidence-based science.

“There is no doubt in my mind that we need some exceptional policy in New York State to ensure the vitality and vibrancy of agriculture as we look towards the future and certainly the research coming out of CALS and the passion that our faculty, staff and students have to address agricultural questions will help inform that policy,” she said.

That is where the relationship between CALS and New York Farm Bureau is so important, according to Boor. She calls it a true partnership, having an ally to carry the message to lawmakers that is informed by what is happening at CALS and other land grant universities.

“The fact that forever, since the beginning of Farm Bureau and Cooperative Extension, we are your partners in making sure the best science gets delivered to Albany and standing with you to that end,” Boor said.

That informed agenda can help to make sure needed research dollars continue to flow to the university to benefit all of agriculture, but also to help lawmakers understand that the work happening on the farm has real value in improving environmental sustainability and food production that we all depend on.

“This is where Farm Bureau is so effective and so important. It is ensuring our farmers’ voices are heard in Albany,” she added.

While she calls her departure from CALS bittersweet, don’t expect that she is leaving the farming community behind. It just means New York agriculture will continue to have her passion for agriculture directed in a new area.

Cornell has launched an initiative for digital agriculture that spans five colleges including CALS, and the schools of business, engineering, veterinary medicine and commuting and technology. As the Dean of the Graduate School, she believes she can breathe new life into that program to address cutting edge needs for agricultural technology and science.

“This is my home and where my heart is, and I am truly honored and thrilled that I have found another opportunity to be able to pour my time, passion and energy to help our students at Cornell,” she said.
